Comment: I cannot see how the infrastructure will cope with increase in demand. The roads in particular are already nearing gridlock not only during rush hour but also either side. While I can see the response being that people will use the train the reality is they won't. It is not safe to assume that because people live near a station they will use it.

There's also the aesthetics to consider and these look like blocks of flats. Unless they are constructed of stone, not just cladding, then I suspect they will have a life expectancy of thirty years which means in just over ten years they will more than likely start looking a bit shabby.
